A STUDY OF THE WRITINGS OF BJORNSTJERNE BJORNSON On a photograph of himself which Bjornson lately sent to an English friend--a remarkably pacific person--he wrote in his bold and flowing hand, fra hans Kjcempefcelle, from his fellowwarrior. These words give an exact superficial impression of the temperament of the most breezy and turbulent, the most agitated and agitating of modern European men of letters. Georg Brandes has aptly said that whenever Bjornson speaks, the flag of Norway seems to be unfurled. Yet a false idea would be formed, if it were not at once added that the primary attraction of this flag to Bjernson is not the idea that its enemies are to be destroyed, but that its friends are to be gathered around it and to be marched somewhere. The direction and object 01 the march are secondary in the poet s...
